HISTORY

The Rico Mine, a small-time mercury mining operation, began in 1916 when Sam Hughes, a Phoenix miner, discovered cinnabar deposits nearby the present location of Northern Avenue and Arizona 51 at the Dreamy Draw Recreation Area. That resulted in the establishment of the Rico mercury mine.

But what the gritty miners, and much of the country, didn't know, was that mercury is a neurotoxin that affects the brain.

After some time working in the mines, the men would go into town or return home acting strange.

Locals said the miners seemed dreamy, which eventually lead to the name Dreamy Draw.

Production figures are small and it remains uncertain whether Hughes profited off his investment, operated by Texas investors through 1933.

The remains of the mine — including the visible furnace piers, cabin foundation and dump site — were paved over in 1991 for the Piastewa Freeway, known today as Arizona 51.

Total production of mercury from the Phoenix Mountains consisted of 65 flasks, an equivalent of 4,973 pounds of mercury mined.

Mercury mining in the area declined in the 1940s as it did over the next fifty years in the United States due to market price and health concerns.
